History of Stonework in India

The history of stone work in India spans from prehistoric times to the present day, starting with practical tools and evolving into complex architectural and sculptural art. Key developments include the refined seals of the Indus Valley Civilization, the polished Ashokan pillars of the Mauryan Empire, the golden age of sculpture during the Gupta period, and grand rock-cut cave temples like those at Ajanta and Ellora. This tradition has continued, with significant contributions from regional dynasties, as seen in the Hoysala temples of Karnataka and the temples of Rajasthan, and is still relevant today in modern architecture.

Prehistoric and early periods

Indus Valley Civilization (c. 3300–1300 BCE): Stone work in this era is evidenced by tools and refined seals and ornaments.

Mauryan period (c. 322–185 BCE): Known for monumental stone sculptures like the Ashoka pillars, which were highly polished and featured animal capitals.
